Excerpt from Federal Archeology, Vol. 8: Summer 1995 Since 1970 and the advent of contract archeology, the number of excavations has mushroomed. Crews work the field longer, going from project to project, which amounts to an overall increase in exposure. Michael Fink of the Arizona Department of Health - one of the few to have written on health hazards in archeology - says that just the fact that archeologists spend so much time around dust poses a potential threat. One never knows what's on those dust particles, he says. Aerosolized droplets of urine from rodents, for example, are known to carry hantavirus. In 1993, there was an outbreak of the disease in the Four Corners area, resulting in several deaths. Trash and packrat middens are a potential source of hantavirus, whose symptoms are similar to the flu, but which can obviously get much worse.
