Was it possible, he asked, that parents having had a disease, say measles or scarlet fever, might to some extent protect a child and cause mildness of type? He remembered a Fleet Surgeon discussing with him having a wholesale propagation of syphilis, so that the system might be rendered immune against it and the disease completely rooted out. He said that making all due allowance it must be admitted that typhoid did exist amongst the native population of India as shown by the records of the J. J. Ispital and records of the Native Army also showed it. He further said that he had seen cases of undoubted typhoid amongst the Parsees. Cases with the anatomical signs had been recorded among the natives. The disease, therefore, might occur among them; and why was it so seldom seen, he...
