Excerpt from The Princeton Review, Vol. 36: October, 1864 Of course, the natural and untrained logic of mankind saved us from accepting the results of such one-sided investigations; and the moral and intellectual world still moved on, sustained by its faith in its God-given capacities to learn, and instinctively set aside, or simply ignored the demonstration, which it could not then answer, that there existed neither mind nor matter - beings to learn, nor things to be learned. Now, however, we have no difficulty in seeing that all knowledge must result from - or we should rather say that it is - the relation of mind with things and facts, and other minds, and from their mutual adaptation to the production of knowledge; and that the mind is no empty tablet, or clean-swept threshing-floor, passively receiving the things and facts, or the impressions and inscriptions of them, which the world may chance to bring before it. But, defective as this theory was, it admitted the mind's receptivity, and therefore, that thus far, at least, it had inherent character and capacity; and inductive science, instead of arbitrarily limiting the mind to this, ought to have taken the hint which the admission gave, and applied itself to a more thorough investigation. We might as well expect the empty tablet to perform the work of the type-founder and the compositor, and the threshing-floor to execute the functions of the mill and the bakery, as to expect the merely receptive capacity of the mind to transform its sensuous individual impressions into will, sentiment, language, conceptions, ideas, and scientific systems. Even the passivity of the cannon-ball before the exploding powder,...
